

QUALIFYING EXAMINATION

The Graduate School does not require programs to administer qualifying examinations, which are typically taken at the end of the first year. In such cases, qualifying examinations are intended to provide an early, general assessment of a student's proficiency in content and/or conceptual understanding of the research process. They may also serve to inform the Plan of Study. If a student is recommended for withdrawal, the Graduate School must be notified.